Domain: Housing and Environment

About this domain
Where and how we live is important to life satisfaction. Having a place to call home contributes to our sense of well-being, security, community, and autonomy. Home is where you can be yourself, engage in your preferred routines, come and go from, invite others into or, close others out from. Many individuals we work with reside in settings where others decide their routines and place limits on their autonomy. In some cases, this has been determined as necessary for their health and safety. But for others, a less restrictive environment is appropriate and preferred.

In this domain, capture your interview specific to housing or the person’s living environment. Learn about any required restrictions to the person’s choice, freedoms, or access before you start this section of the assessment conversation. Within that context, discover the person’s preferences for where and how they want to live. Listen for concerns and desires related to where the person lives or prefers to live. Include goals for addressing concerns and/or searching for alternative living environments in the person’s plan.
